Identifying & Supporting Students Who Want To Leave: Challenges & Opportunities Friday, September 14 ~ 1:00-2:00pm (Eastern)

Once the live date has passed, this training will be available on demand.

Overview

Improving retention and graduation rates have been a major concern for administrators and state and federal governments. The national 6-year graduation rate for students who graduate from the same institution they started at is 59% (National Center for Education Statistics, 2017). Increasing pressures and decreasing resources have made it even more difficult when working with students who want to leave your institution. In this webinar, a brief overview of the findings from a research project and brief coaching intervention will be shared to understand first-year college students who want to the leave institution. Students were identified using a Mapworks survey and were outreached to several times.

We will discuss things to consider when working with students who want to leave and suggestions on how to identify these students. Examples of student stories will be shared to understand these experiences from a different perspective. Practical suggestions and ethical considerations will be offered to understand and work with this unique population of students. We will leave time at the end of the webinar for you to focus on your institution, to brainstorm and think creatively about how to support students who want to leave within your sphere of influence.

Objectives:

- Define students who want to leave
- Identify challenges to working with first-year students who want to leave
- Describe results from qualitative interviews with students who wanted to leave within the first few weeks of school

Speaker(s)

Alicia Sepulveda

University of Northern Colorado

Alicia Sepulveda is a fourth year PhD student in Higher Education and Student Affairs Leadership at University of Northern Colorado. For the past 8 years, Alicia has worked with hundreds of college students one-on-one at various programs focused on improving retention and holistically support students. At Florida State University, she served as an Academic Success Coach and later as an Assistant Program Manager in a coaching program for first-year students. She then moved to the greater DC area, where she worked at a non-profit college access organization, helping students from first-generation, low-income, minority, and immigrant backgrounds to make the most of their college experience and graduate. Working outside of the institution, and instead, for the student, gave Alicia incredible insight into the perceptions students have about college. Alicia is currently in the fourth year of a program that helps first-year students who want to leave, to navigate the decision making process, eliminate barriers to enrollment, and help students make plans to leave when necessary. Her research and personal interests include coaching college students, self-help and personal development in college, and inspiring college students to believe in themselves and create a plan to make their dreams a reality. Alicia is also the host of the College Life podcast – a podcast to help current college students make the most of their time in college and take ownership of their college journey.
